effort to improve some aspects of the standard of living, but they were economically absurd and caused a disproportionate pressure on production, frequently resulting in speculation on the market. Complete decentralization of prices is still far away, because the economists have to utilize political factors in establishing prices in order to get rid of certain disproportions in production. The central authorities therefore cannot renounce price directives until it becomes possible to create conditions for rational price fixing by harmonizing the internal relations of the economy. At the moment economists have concluded that the proposal to introduce a system of prices based on direct bargaining between the supplying and ordering enterprises would be inadmissible. In this context, to use profits as the sole indicator of the efficiency of the enterprise would not prove feasible. . . .

While these discussions were going on, Pravda published on its front page Lenin's recently-discovered manuscript concerning the tasks of Soviet authorities. . . . Lenin wrote: "The transition from a capitalist to a socialist society consists in the fact that political tasks are subordinated to economic ones." Further: "To a great extent it is necessary to study the organization of socialism from the point of view of the managers of trusts and the important organizers of capitalism." In connection with the current discussion regarding the management of the economy, one more quotation should be noted: "When the problems of convincing the people and the conquest of power were of first importance, the agitators were given the leading positions." This leads to an interesting corollary—the above-mentioned task—priority of the economy over politics—makes it necessary to put the organizers into leading positions, because it is impossible for old men to adapt themselves to new tasks.
